

Claude Baillargeon

A book presenting a totally new interpretation of movements occurring on our planet, no longer confined by religious, philosophical and political borders of the past. The human race today is clearly divided between those who are tolerant and those who are intolerant; between proponents of a single model that is the legacy of a past now raised to mythical status and advocates of plurality and movement; between believers in a single, exclusive dogma and those advocating knowledge (regardless of any individual beliefs), advocating experimental, scientific and critical research and learning at any age or stage in life; between people who consider that immediate personal interests should prevail over their relationships with others and those in favour of exchanges and solidarity as part of the experience of living in a local-global community, of choice through many different visions of the world and of saving our shared planet. In other words, it is the Monoretros versus the Plurofuturos.
